TRAINING INTRODUCTION

Managers and decision makers are introduced to, regularly, many training programs. It is easy to make sound decisions when the training is related to defined, agreed upon, and measurable skills (HARD SKILLS) such as operating machines or applying a recognized procedure. It is very difficult, however, to take decisions when the training relates to skills that have no recognized and measurable standards (SOFT SKILLS), such as communications, or leadership.

The secret for taking the correct decision depends totally, on the quality of analysis that leads to detecting the training and development needs for the working individuals, for supporting the organization's needs, wants and desires.

Participants will learn the skills that will allow them to correctly, analyze training and developmental needs through better understanding of analytical skills, performance improvement, and organization development concepts and practices.
